

Betty Krier is the Chief Economist at the Office of Inspector General of the US Department of Transportation. In that capacity, she has led quantitative analyses informing transportation regulation and legislation, assessing efficiency in government service provision, and assessing collusion in procurement processes. Previously, she constructed models for investment banks and consulted on energy economics. She received her graduate economics training at MIT, and her undergraduate degree from Harvard University.